

For Project 2, I chose Unna as my font. I like simple, classic-looking serifs like this, so it drew my attention. I also liked that it had multiple variations to work with. For my website design, I chose to go with houseplants as my theme and kind of went from there. I chose green as the background color because of the subject matter and added in yellow as a pop of color later. I wanted to keep the actual website design elements fairly simple to be able to show the type off rather than the other elements, and I think using the white text on the green background helped to do this. I used thin lines throughout the website as a simple way to section things off. Overall, this website went a lot smoother for me than project one, but my biggest challenge was the grid at the bottom of the webpage. Beyond that, I enjoyed this project and feel like I've learned a lot!
